To announce a Professional Development opportunity for secondary Social Sciences and English/Language Arts teachers.

- The Division of Academics, Department of Social Sciences is offering a professional development workshop provided by News Literacy Project (NLP) and Univision for Secondary Social Sciences and English/Language Arts teachers.

- NewsLitCamps were created by NLP to help educators improve their own news literacy skills, introduce them to resources for teaching news literacy and get their ideas and input for new resources. Educators will leave with new ideas, skills and resources to help their students navigate today’s complex information landscape and beat back a rising tide of misinformation. We also want to encourage a greater understanding between journalists and teachers — including an appreciation of the realities that both face in playing a vital civic role with increasingly scarce resources.

- NewsLitCamp! is a day-long professional development workshop primarily for middle school and high school educators. Using a hybrid approach to “edcamp”-style continuing education, it features topical sessions (developed with input from attending teachers) in the morning and open-ended, educator-driven planning and development time in the afternoon. This format gives education professionals an opportunity to come together in the engaging, fast-paced environment of a news organization for a day of news literacy training and conversations with journalists, NLP staff, Univision reporters and editors.
